My dear Madam:-

I want to thank you for sending what bills you did to me, but unfortunately those you sent are too poor to be worth anything to speak of. As I told you before they have little value any way, but when collectors do want them, they want them running in better condition. The pieces that I picked out that day are the only ones that have any especial worth to collectors. If you care to sell those that I picked out including the four other Texan notes, I can get $7.50 for the whole lot. I think this is rather a good offer. If you care to accept it, I will send you a check. If, however, you feel you want to keep these, I will return the pieces that you have sent me, keeping the discolored Texan note at $.20.

Very truly yours,

Dear Madam:-

On September 12th I wrote you making an offer for some of your paper money, and as I have not heard from you regarding this, I fear the letter may have gone astray. I would be glad to know, at your earliest convenience, whether you have received the letter or not.

Dear Madam:-

Your favor with the notes at hand, and I am keeping those that we lack here, and am returning to you the others. I am also enclosing my check for $7.50. This is a good deal more than one would usually get for these kind of notes, but I found somebody who wanted some of them, and was willing to pay a good price as you see.

Very truly,

Dear Madam:-

Your note introducing Mr. Hartmann was handed to me on my return from a weeks trip away. I am not at all familiar with the book trade in New York and I am afraid that I cannot help you with what books you have. If they are worth anything, undoubtedly there is a market somewhere here in New York.

Very truly yours,
